A Heartfelt Request

The coronavirus pandemic has impacted almost every aspect of American life, including the performing arts. Theatre companies, music venues and art museums across the country have largely shuttered for the last 14 months. For some non-profit arts groups, the impacts have been devastating. Some will struggle to come back in the coming year, and others will never reopen.

For those of us whose passion in life is performance--music, dance and telling stories in front of a live audience--it has been a time of reflection, reassessment and innovation--a time to rethink how we create, how we interact with audiences and how we can begin to reach out more effectively to new audiences and communities.

For audience members and avid theatre goers, the last year reminded us just how integral and vital the arts are to the social, civic and economic well-being of our communities. More than anything, I think the pandemic has made us understand what the arts mean to all our lives.

We are grateful to be back on stage in front of a live audience tonight, doing what we love to do: telling stories that entertain, challenge, enrich and inspire. As we welcome you back to live theatre and to the wonderfully eccentric world of Shakespeare's Illyria, we ask that you take a moment to reflect on the immense value of the performing arts to our community and lives, and to sincerely consider contributing a bit more than you might normally in the coming year, whether that be with your attendance at performances, your financial support, your volunteerism or your advocacy.

Valley Shakespeare Company and countless other arts groups in the Willamette Valley will need help in the coming year to ensure that we can continue to celebrate together and embrace the rich gift of the performing arts for many years to come.

Thank you,
David Janowiak
